

Strait of Bonifacio

by Jürgen Winterberg, MSPE

Located in the Mediterranean Sea, the Strait of Bonifacio separates the islands of Corsica to its north and Sardinia to its south. Whereas Corsica (the fourth-largest island in the Mediterranean Sea) belongs to France, Sardinia (the second-largest island after Sicily) is part of Italian territory.

At its narrowest place, the Strait of Bonifacio is only about 7 miles (11 km) wide. It is named after the Corsican town of Bonifacio at the southern end of Corsica, which you can faintly see in the background of the photograph. (For further reading, consider <https://www.bonifacio.co.uk/>.)

This picture was taken from what is nearly the most northern location of Sardinia, a little peninsula named Capo Testa. (For more information, refer to <https://www.santateresagalluraturismo.com/en/>.) In the foreground, you can see some of the spectacular, bizarre, granite rock formations which are quite typical for this area as a result of wind erosion. Take note of the hikers to get an idea of the dimensions of the rocks. Ω
